WITH GRATITUDE AND RESPECT

Thank you—two simple words that convey so much. In my position at Syracuse University, I have the privilege of working with many alumni who give their time, talent, and resources to benefit our University. Often I feel I don't say "thank you" to them nearly enough.

We are guided by the Alumni Board of Directors, ably led by board president and University Trustee Michael Somich '73. The board advises this office in setting policy and implementing programs. Our board members are deeply committed to helping us serve you and for that I am most grateful.

Across the country we have alumni club and council leaders who give countless hours of service to Syracuse University. These volunteers organize events, welcome new students, and fund scholarships, to name just a few of their activities.

To those of you who are already involved with SU as volunteers, you have our gratitude and respect. You are an important part of our continued success. We welcome the involvement and support of our alumni and encourage you to get involved and stay involved with SU!

MEET SUSAs

There are students who maintain strong ties to Syracuse University after they graduate. Then there are students like Naomi Marcus '02. Just beginning her college career, she has already established a bond with the SU alumni community.

Marcus is an active member of the Syracuse University Student Alumni Association (SUSA), a student volunteer organization sponsored by the Office of Alumni Relations that serves as a link between students and the University's 220,000 alumni.

For Marcus and her fellow student volunteers, SUSA's appeal lies in its ability to bridge generations. "It sounded like a different kind of organization," Marcus says. "Alumni share their experiences with us, and we keep them up-to-date on what's going on here right now. It really opens doors for students and alumni."

According to Scott Setek, associate direc-

and hosted many Homecoming Weekend activities. "The goals of SUSA include providing leadership roles for students, providing career and mentoring opportunities for students, connecting and networking with Syracuse alumni, and maintaining traditions and a sense of pride in Syracuse University," says Setek.

Danie Moss '99 says taking an active role in Homecoming Weekend was a milestone for SUSA. She and past SUSA president Kristin Kuntz '99 saw it as a good way to promote the organization. "Homecoming is a great opportunity for us to interact with alumni," Moss says. "People don't always realize how much they can learn from other generations, so an organization like this is mutually beneficial."

Senior Alison Nathan has been pleasantly surprised by how interested alumni are in what is happening on campus. "They are very proud of their association

tor of alumni relations, the group sponsors an array of campus activities—Career Connections Night, this spring's revival of the Dance Marathon, Orange Day, among others. Members also stay active with community service projects, and volunteer at least one hour a week in the alumni relations office. This year SUSA planned with Syracuse University, which is inspiring to see," she says.

Marcus says being active with SUSA has already made her think about how her relationship with SU will evolve. "SUSA opened my eyes to the fact that the SU community goes far beyond the 15,000 people that are here now," she says.

YOUNG ALUMNI COUNCIL

The first years after graduation are filled with changes. But that doesn't have to mean saying goodbye to SU—at least not completely. To help recent graduates maintain their University connections, the Office of Alumni Relations created the Young Alumni Council. "It's a tumultuous, challenging, and exciting time," says Gwen Moran '88, who represents the council on the Alumni Board. "Once you leave the University, it's easy to lose touch. Yet in many ways, Commencement is the beginning of a whole new relationship with SU."

"The council's aim is to expand opportunities for young alumni in the life of SU, and to increase communication between the University and its young alumni population," says Scott Setek of the Office of Alumni Relations. "It also gives alumni an opportunity to serve the University by recruiting potential students and performing community service."

Rob Luzzi '89 says the council can serve as a stepping stone for younger alumni. By targeting this age group, the University keeps recent graduates involved with the campus during the transitional years instead of having to reconnect later. "They are busy trying to establish themselves, but I think it is important to target these alumni," Luzzi says.

Jeff Quebec '94 is convinced that younger alumni are eager to stay involved. "They want to do something," he says, "but they often can't contribute in a financial way, at least not with what they consider to be a sizable donation. This is a way for them to remain strong in their school spirit."

Council members apply their talents through a number of committees: advancement, admissions, career advancement, marketing, programming, and young alumni—six key areas in which recent graduates can help SU. "It is another way for the University to get the word out there," Luzzi says.

Quebec, a member of the Boston Area Alumni Club, chairs the admissions committee. He enjoys sharing his SU experiences with prospective students. "It makes a big difference when kids can talk to someone who has actually been there," he says. "They can get a better idea of what it is like."

Members of the Young Alumni Council are always on the lookout for new recruits, a difficult task when career changes often keep recent graduates on the move. "We're looking for anyone who's out there," Quebec says. "I think the Young Alumni Council is an organization the University is rightfully putting a lot of emphasis on."

Moran says this focus will continue. A council newsletter is in the works, and recent mailings have been successful in generating interest. "A relationship with Syracuse is a living, breathing thing," she says. "We need to communicate that."

Homecoming brings members of many SU organizations together once again. Alumni cheerleaders, led by Warren "Cookie" Kimble '57, kneeling at the far right of the front row, look forward to cheering on SU, as they did at last year's event.

HOMECOMING '99: OCTOBER 29-31

This year Homecoming Weekend comes a little earlier than usual, and the Office of Alumni Relations promises another fun-filled schedule of events. Of course football will top the agenda, with the Orangemen taking on Boston College at the Carrier Dome. Last year's exciting Homecoming game ended with a touchdown pass in the final seconds.

The classes of 1984, 1989, and 1994 will celebrate their Reunions during this year's Homecoming, following the successful format implemented last year. Come back to campus and enjoy a lecture, or make plans to meet classmates and old friends. Don't miss out on a fabulous weekend! Anyone wishing to help with any of the Homecoming Reunion events is encouraged to get involved.

Your suggestions are always welcome at the Office of Alumni Relations. Call 1-800-SUALUMS, or visit our web page at <http://www.syracuse.edu/alumni/whatsnew.html>

PLAN EARLY

For those anxious to fill out their calendars, keep June 2-4, 2000 in mind. That's when Reunion Weekend 2000 will bring people back to campus. We'll keep you posted through the Internet and Syracuse University Magazine. Volunteers are needed. Call 1-800-SUALUMS (782-5867) or 315-443-3258; e-mail: sualumni@sy.edu

ARENTS AWARD WINNERS

Reunion '99 included special recognition for three outstanding alumni. Bradley Anderson '51 (VPA), Molly Corbett Broad '62 (A&S), and Bernie Wohl '51 (A&S) will each receive the George Arents Pioneer Medal—the highest honor bestowed on SU alumni.

Bradley Anderson of Montgomery, Texas, probably isn't as well known as one of his cartoon creations. The freelance cartoonist, whose early work appeared in magazines such as The Saturday Evening Post and Colliers, created Marmaduke in 1954. The strip, chronicling the antics of a lovable, mischievous Great Dane, is now syndicated in more than 600 newspapers worldwide. Anderson, who studied advertising and illustration at SU, says after more than 40 years, he still enjoys drawing his most famous character. Together Anderson and Marmaduke use their recognition for the greater good, promoting the American Cancer Society and the American Association of Blood Banks.

Molly Corbett Broad of Chapel Hill, North Carolina, still spends much of her time on a college campus these days—actually 16 different campuses—as president of the University of North Carolina, the oldest public university in the country. She was previously executive vice chancellor and chief operating officer of the California State University (CSU) system, the largest senior system of higher education in the country. She launched her career in university administration and finance at Ohio State University, where she earned a master's degree; and returned to SU in 1971 as manager of the Office of Budget and Planning. Broad was later director of institutional research and vice president for government and corporate relations. She left Syracuse in 1985 when she was named executive director and chief executive officer of the Arizona Board of Regents. Broad was the chief administrator for the three-campus University of Arizona system until she joined CSU in 1992. She is a member of several national education boards, and is married to Robert Broad '60 (MAN).

After 46 years in the field of social work, Bernie Wohl shows no signs of slowing down. He's just changing his focus. Perhaps best known for his activism in the local settlement house movement and co-founding the New York State Association of Settlements and Community Centers, Wohl has applied his interest in human service to a variety of endeavors. In 1961, the New York City native moved to Columbus, Ohio, to serve as executive director of Southside Settlement, a position he held for 11 years. In 1972 he began his 26-year association with the Goddard Riverside Community Center in New York City. The center serves approximately 20,000 people a year. He retired as executive director last year to spend more time working with the national and international settlement house movements.

Recipients of the Eggers Senior Alumni Awards were also honored during Reunion. They will be profiled in the fall issue.

TRAVELS WITH SU

Sure, everyone loves the view from the Hill. But who can resist a walk in Tuscany, a tour of the Vatican, or a cruise on the Mediterranean Sea?

SU alumni have had three recent opportunities to enjoy the splendors of Italy. This year's tour, which has already sold out, features a series of walks through the Tuscany Valley. Last September, Alumni College Abroad featured an educational sightseeing excursion to the same region. Other, more leisure-loving travel buffs enjoyed a 16-day Mediterranean cruise in October.

Jean Frulla '49 and husband Rino have taken a trip most every year since 1990. The SU tours, she says, offer a variety of options. The couple enjoyed the pace of last year's Mediterranean cruise, despite a few very wet days in Venice. "We really enjoyed Pisa and Pompeii and the things we saw at the Vatican and the Sistine Chapel," Frulla says.

Alumni College in Tuscany attracted a wide variety of alumni, spouses, and friends. These happy travelers enjoyed every minute of the trip, including this "graduation ceremony" on their last night in Cortona, Italy.

While visiting the various ports along the Mediterranean, the Frullas took advantage of the optional day tours. "We like them because you see many highlights in a very short time," Frulla says, adding that the trip was very well organized and accommodating to a variety of travelers.

The Alumni Campus Abroad tour of Tuscany went beyond traditional sightseeing. With lectures and on-site presentations given by locals, travelers gained educational and cultural insights into the region.

Rod Sager '48 and wife Ruth were among those who "studied" in Tuscany last year. "We loved it," Ruth says. "We had gone on SU trips before, but had never done a study program. This one caught our eye because we were interested in learning more about that part of the world."

The group stayed in a charming hotel in the village of Cortona and visited such well-known Tuscan cities as Florence, Assisi, and Siena. Participants enjoyed having a "home base" where they could relax, regroup, and reflect on each day's events. "We loved the idea of staying in one place and not having to change hotels," says Grace Kellner, who traveled with husband Ken '60.

Participants received a reading list before the trip so they could study the historical and aesthetic treasures they would encounter. "That added a lot," says Ruth Sager. "You really felt like you learned something."

Those with a particular interest in art or history enjoyed lectures and visits to local galleries and cathedrals. Kellner, who has an appreciation for Renaissance art, found the presentations informative and easy to follow. "You can miss a great deal if you're just wandering around on your own," she says. "We learned a tremendous amount, including an appreciation of an exceedingly beautiful area. I would certainly go on another trip like this."

SU continues its romance with Tuscany in October. On daily excursions by foot, participants will see the breathtaking images of Renaissance culture up close. The group will begin in Florence, setting out for walks to Settignano, the birthplace of Michelangelo, and the Chianti wine region. During the eight-day tour, the group will trek through the villages of Greve, San Gimignano, and Pienza, as well as the city of Siena—seemingly built for pedestrians.

Daryl Forsythe '65, G'79

When officials from NBT Bancorp Inc. of Norwich, New York, looked for someone to assume leadership, they found the right candidate on their own board of directors. What is surprising is that he's not a banker. Instead, Daryl R. Forsythe is a proven manager with impeccable credentials: 28 years of experience in the aerospace industry, including service as vice president and general manager of the Engine Systems Division of Simmonds Precision; general manager of the Aerospace Engine Electrical Systems Division of B.F. Goodrich; and director of quality for the Electrical Components Division of Bendix Corp.

What Forsythe brought to the bank president's desk was a philosophy of banking that emphasized service, an area the bank had sorely neglected in recent years. "It's imperative for a community bank to offer service and become part of the community," he says. Accordingly, he turned the organization's focus away from rampant expansion and toward redefining its personality and mission.

It worked. "We're very successful, with four years of record earnings," he says. "We have 35 branches stretching from Pennsylvania to Canada and our stock has appreciated dramatically."

Forsythe is convinced that community banks will always have a place in this country. "It's really about the way you run your business," he emphasizes. "It's attention to customers, giving them services they demand. Some want drive-up windows and ATMs; others want to see tellers. Some want to use the Internet for banking; others want to come in. We have to provide all these options."

Forsythe found the switch to banking satisfying. "When I took over, our bank was in a somewhat troubled state," he says. "There were management problems; the community had a negative perception of us. We've turned that around dramatically."

Forsythe, who received an undergraduate degree from SU's Utica College and an M.B.A. on main campus, brings that same innovative thinking to the University's Board of Trustees, where he's served since 1997. As a member of the budget committee, he helps set parameters for the University's financial status.

"The University gave me a great education," he says. "Standards at Utica College were high because they were SU standards. I'm happy to use my expertise on its behalf."

a. Patricia Johnson '66

ew things fill A. Patricia Caskey Johnson with more pride than receiving North Carolina's Great 100 award for leaders in the nursing profession. Except perhaps knowing her management staff nominated her for the honor. "I was humbled by the award," says Johnson, vice president of operations and chief nurse executive at Wake Forest University Baptist Medical Center.

Even a brief review of Johnson's accomplishments would show how deserving she is of the award, which honors the state's top nurses for excellence in nursing and commitment to the nursing profession. With 32 years' experience in nursing administration and management, Johnson has long advocated quality patient care and professional nursing practice. The Great 100 committee cited her as being "a visible manager who strives to foster professional growth and move nursing to meet the challenges of the future."

"Receiving this award made me reflect on how many changes we've been through since I started working here in 1994," Johnson says. "New programs were implemented to establish a more facilitative environment, and nurses are more empowered in their work."

Before joining Baptist Medical Center, Johnson served as vice president of patient care services at New Britain General Hospital in Connecticut. A registered nurse and member of the Sigma Theta Tau National Nursing Honor Society, she is an active volunteer who takes leadership roles at such health organizations as Hospice and the American Association of Nurse Executives. Johnson is also an adjunct faculty member and serves on the School of Nursing Advisory Board at the University of North Carolina-Greensboro.

She credits her undergraduate experience at Syracuse University with laying the groundwork for success. "The SU program was rigorous," she remembers. "Faculty members pushed us to excellence, and we gave a lot in return."

Johnson often comes in contact with SU graduates, and recently hired an alumna at Baptist Medical Center. She is impressed that Syracuse graduates consistently demonstrate high standards and the same loyalty to SU she feels. "I believe SU has one of the finest colleges of nursing in the country," she says, "which is exemplified by the excellence of its graduates." —Amy Shires

Gadam Gross '79

Gadam Gross thinks he must have come out of the womb with a passion for architecture. "I was constantly building with Lincoln Logs and Erector sets," he says.

These days Gross's projects are a bit bigger. A partner in Baltimore-based Ayers/Saint/Gross Architects, he creates buildings on college campuses all along the East Coast. Gross designed the College of Law's Winifred MacNaughton Hall, which opened last year. For Gross, it was a welcomed assignment—one that allowed him to return to campus several times and reminisce about his SU days.

After his sophomore year, Gross participated in the first of the architecture school's highly successful summer programs in Florence. When he returned to the United States, he began working for architect Richard Meier in New York City, and transferred to Cooper Union in New York. At one summer program, he met award-winning architect Werner Seligmann, the new dean of SU's School of Architecture, who persuaded him to return.

"Coming back was the best decision I ever made," Gross says. "Werner brought in some of the best faculty from around the world. It was a life-changing experience—he really created my sense of who I am as an architect."

After graduation, Gross worked for a Boston firm that specialized in university design. When he moved to Ayers/Saint, he realized university work was his ideal. "The people you work for care deeply about the buildings you design," he says. "Over the last 10 years we've completely focused our practice on collegiate work."

Another perk, he says, is working in such picturesque settings as Chapel Hill, North Carolina—and right here on the SU Hill. "Syracuse has a beautiful campus," Gross says. "The Center for Science and Technology, the Shaffer Art Building, Eggers Hall—they're all terrific buildings by good architects, people I have a lot of respect for."

Gross says architecture is a perfect blend of art, culture, humanity, business, and engineering. "Architect William Lescaze said: 'Architects have to be practical dreamers.' That's always defined how I look at my profession."

matt Koll G'79

matt Koll has credentials that easily intimidate technophobes. The Bethesda, Maryland, resident has a Ph.D. from the School of Information Studies, and his Personal Library Software company was recently acquired by America Online (AOL). But a down-to-earth manner and matter-of-fact acceptance of his professional success put you immediately at ease—with him, and the entire concept of computer technology.

To a large extent, Koll attributes his achievements to being as comfortable with personal communications and human relationships as he is with the technical aspects of his work. "In our field the focus is on people who can act as change agents, crossing the divide between different kinds of audiences," Koll says.

He credits the information studies program with helping him develop these skills, and recognizes similar talents in today's Syracuse graduates. That important combination can be hard to find in technology experts, but Koll always looks for it when hiring new employees. "Our business has benefited greatly from recruiting and hiring Syracuse graduates," he says. "The School of Information Studies turns out talented people who are skilled in both the technical and marketing aspects of the field."

Since AOL acquired his company, Koll has adjusted to some exciting changes, including his new title of AOL Fellow. "I have a very clear sense of working for a larger audience," he says. "It's a nice feeling to know that what we do affects millions of people."

Essentially, though, Koll says his job hasn't changed. "I'm still doing what I've always done—developing advanced information retrieval software that lets people get their hands on the information they need in ways that are faster and easier."

Kathryn Brown G'80

In the fast-paced world of the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), Kathryn Brown's job duties are many and varied—much like the long-distance telephone service options made available to residential consumers after deregulation took effect. A 1980 graduate of the College of Law, Brown joined the FCC last year as chief of the Common Carrier Bureau, the regulatory agency for telephone services. She was appointed chief of staff within months, and now works directly for FCC Chairman William Kennard. "I have a wonderful job," Brown says. "If you work in government, this is the most exciting place to be. It's the most robust industry in the world."

Brown didn't expect her career to take this turn when she was a law student at Syracuse. Since graduation, she has worked as deputy clerk for the New York State Court of Appeals and director of the New York State Public Service Commission's Consumer Services Division. As association administrator at the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, her work focused on implementing the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

As FCC chief of staff, Brown is responsible for understanding and being prepared to address the wide range of major issues surrounding telephone, cable, and mass media services that come before the agency, including inquiries from Congress and the press. She handles everything from discussing the chairman's agenda and helping prepare his speeches to attending policy meetings and dealing with budget issues. She recently returned from a road trip to Atlanta, New Orleans, and San Antonio that included speaking engagements at community organizations and schools. "I have to know what issues are percolating," she says.

Although she remembers Syracuse as the land of "snow, snow, snow," Brown credits the College of Law with providing a solid groundwork that contributed to her success. "It was beneficial to my career," she says. "I'm very proud to say I'm a Syracuse University graduate."

Howard Adams G'79

When Howard Adams was working on his doctoral degree in higher education administration, he was a graduate assistant for Charles Willie G'57, then SU's vice president for student affairs and now a professor at Harvard University. "Dr. Willie was my mentor—I learned so much from him," Adams says. "I learned how to build coalitions—getting folks to work together on your team when you didn't think you stood a chance."

Adams, who lives in Atlanta, put those lessons to good use. He is director of the National Institute on Mentoring, which he founded in 1994, and is a popular speaker and seminar presenter at colleges, universities, and Fortune 500 companies. He was one of the first recipients of the Presidential Award for Excellence in Science, Mathematics, and Engineering Mentoring Programs. "Most people never quite get where they could have been," he says. "That's what mentoring is about—getting people to do more than what they think they have the capacity to do."

Adams taught general science and biology at junior and senior high schools in Norfolk, Virginia, before taking a job at Norfolk State University, where he was director of alumni affairs and, later, vice president for student affairs.

In 1978 he became executive director of the National Consortium for Graduate Degrees for Minorities in Engineering and Science (GEM), where he spent more than 17 years designing strategies and developing programs to enhance the participation and success of ethnic minorities and women in engineering, science, and technical careers. "I came in right after it got off the ground," he says. "I took it from a struggling program to one that ended up being nationally recognized. We went from a budget of $450,000 to $4.5 million by the time I left. We were serving 40 to 50 students when I got there; when I left we were serving 500."

Adams's National Institute on Mentoring offers training and publications to develop mentoring programs. "We help people make mentoring a factor in structuring a mindset for success," he says. "It all goes back to the notion of capacity. Most people look at life and say, 'In a different world, a different setting, I would have been different.' We say success is not an accident—it happens because you plan for it. We try to help people plan for success."

the neat thing about Henry Manayan is that he actually says stuff like, "The neat thing about America is that Americans recognize merit and initiative." Because he sincerely believes that, this 43-year-old mayor of Milpitas, California, consciously fashions his life to serve as a role model.

The first Filipino-American elected mayor of a California city, Manayan says he's always believed community service is an important part of life and remembers his father's involvement in service organizations.

After completing a dual degree in political science and speech communication at SU, Manayan got a law degree from Santa Clara University and set up shop in the heart of Silicon Valley. He soon moved into commercial real estate investment, but managed to find time to volunteer with several nonprofit groups, secure an appointment to the city's planning commission, and win election to the city council and, later, the mayor's seat.

"Ever since I was a Boy Scout, whether I was on a chamber of commerce or a charity board, I've always believed it was worth fighting for something that was right and would improve the community," he says. "It does make a difference."

He has his work cut out for him in Milpitas, a city of almost 55,000 people, 40 percent of whom are Asian American. The largest of 15 towns in Silicon Valley, Milpitas is dominated by the technology industry. "In the 14.5 square miles of our town, there are more than 300 high-tech companies," he says. "Growth is wonderful, but keeping up the infrastructure is challenging. Within the last few years we've created more than 200,000 new jobs in the valley, but only 38,000 housing units. Our workforce commutes long distances and our schools are bursting."

Despite the demands of his schedule, Manayan manages to return to Syracuse to visit classmates and former professors. "My speech communication background was invaluable, especially my experience as captain of the debate team and president of Speakers Union," he says. "That's where I learned to express my views and articulate my thoughts."

Manayan hasn't yet made plans for after his mayoral term, which ends in 2000. "I want to be known as someone who built consensus and ran government like a business," he says, "and as someone who gave to the community."

RECONNECTING WITH CUSTOMERS

By Jack Myers '69
250 pp. Spurge Ink! $27.95

The Relationship Age—as it evolves from the Information Age—requires businesses to put relationships first and “the deal” second. As the marketplace attempts to reconnect advertising, promotion, and marketing to sales, profits, and brand equity, Myers provides a manual for those who are interested in this innovative way of doing business.

TEA THAT BURNS:

A Family Memoir of Chinatown

By Bruce Edward Hall '76
320 pp. Free Press. $25.

In the first chapter, Hall writes, “There are ghosts in Chinatown.” And the ghosts come to life in this engaging history of New York's Chinatown as told through Hall's stories of four generations of ancestors. There is the patriarch who played a major role in the Tong Wars, the grandfather who was the neighborhood's favorite bookie, and many others. The vivid narrative shows the bewilderment and beauty of a new world, complete with violence, discrimination, and hope.
